SUPPLEMENT TO MOTION FOR BOND

Unique among the findings to be made by a fact-finder in motions hearings and a trial, a bond hearing calls upon the court to predict a person's future behavior. In particular, the evidence presented requires the court to predict whether a person will show up for court when required and whether the person, if released, will abide by the laws of society. The prediction itself, to be reliable, must be based upon facts established regarding the person's past – whether the accused lived his life well up to the point of arrest and possesses the character and reputation among others to show a life well-lived, whether he has roots in the community that run deep, and, to the point of this memorandum, whether an assessment of
